

INCLUSIO

Michael Theune

Black-rooted and wild-eyed, we are,
every one of us,
born into the smallest room in the world.

Beneath the dry light of the star charts we are made to get a feel for the place, the sackcloth and the ash, the echoes and what escapes us:

this swell of histories, these dark ages somehow in the midst of light years.

To be at home in the meantime: this is our one term for surrender, and we make what we can of this make-believe, our hands held exactly by whatever it is they hold.